Motivating the Team

By Asha Seshan

“Find out what motivates the kids on your team: pizza party, a movie, patches.”

Each team and each student is motivated differently. For some, playing with LEGO is all they want or joined for. So how do you encourage the kids to learn all that FIRST LEGO League has to offer them?

Motivating your team

Creating a badge system: When I had a large team with mixed interest levels, I used patches (much like Boy Scout Merit badge systems) as prizes for learning new skills. I used a large sheet poster paper and put the names of the kids on the top and the various skills they could learn on the side. I created little packets for them to place their patch in as they earned them.

What skills do they learn? In the picture on the left, I have Teamwork, Determination, Bright Idea!, Oops, Early Bird, Organized, and Note taking. Most of them speak for themselves, but some are worth talking about. The “Oops” patch was given when students made a mistake, but could learn from the mistake. Early Bird was given as an encouragement to get their work done ahead of time. Note taking was given out to encourage the students to take notes when we went on field trips or interviewed someone.

When each child completed their row, they received a large FIRST patch. When the entire team completed all all their patches, they all we celebrated together with a movie and pizza.

Alternative Systems: While I gave out physical patches that the kids could keep, you can always substitute this with a sticker or electronic badge system. You could be as high-level or specific as you want. For example, I focused on “additional skills from FLL” – time management, determination, teamwork, note taking, etc. But this system could work even for specific programming skills: line following, turning, gyro, etc.

You might also find that it is not patches that motivates your team. When you have a team of mixed ability and interest, finding some way to encourage all the kids is important. So if you find that the students lack motivation, put some thought into what would work best for your team.

Where can I purchase these patches? I got most of mine from Advantage Emblem

(<https://www.advantageemblem.com/>). I purchased their stock patches (existing patches). If you have a large budget, you can even create your own custom ones. I purchased the FIRST patch from Adafruit (<https://www.adafruit.com/products/488>). It appears that they no longer carry this patch.
